SHIELD G-MAN CLUB

BULLETIN NO. 31

1171 6146

The meeting is now called to order. The first business for the day is getting you members together. Especially the new ones. Dusty and I just had a thought which we'll pass on to you. It's this. How about you older members dropping a line to the new ones that appear on this page, sort of welcoming them into the club. We want them to feel like they're part of one great big happy family, don't we? And you'd be surprised how many friends you make that way. Start right now. Write to the new members who are listed below the bulletin, and kind of get to know each other. . . . Move to Joe Tykocin: Here's how to run a Shield G-Man Club. Round up all the Shield G-Man Members in your neighborhood, and hold a meeting once a week or so. Elect a chief G-Man, and an assistant chief. They'll appoint special investigators, and that's all there is to it. But be sure and send us a report of your activities at least once a month. That way we'll be able to keep tabs on you and make suggestions from time to time. . . . Move to David Driscoll: Your idea of having our members draw their own villains, naming them and sending them in to us is a good one. We'll give a prize for the best villain submitted that way. So, take time and have fun with it.

Here are the names of some of our latest members:

DESIGN FOR DYING

A BLACK HOOD STORY

By H. L. COOPER

64 HOW do you like that?" said Kip Burland turning to Barbara Sutton annoyedly. "You finally got me down to one of these long haired ballet dancers, and what happens, the star doesn't show up."

"Well, don't look at me like it was my fault, Kip, that he suddenly took sick."

Kip helped Baba on with her wrap, and they proceeded to leave the theater. Suddenly, Baba turned to Kip and said, "Maybe the evening isn't completely wasted, Kip. I'll drop in on Chekhov's dressing room and get a story for my paper on his illness. Good human interest stuff. You know, the wind of the ballet gives his all for the dear, dear public and breaks down, etc., etc."

"Include me too, Baba. This is my night off. I've forgotten I'm a cop, so why don't you forget that you're a reporter, and let's go to a good movie . . . which we should have done in the first place," Kip said wisely.

"Oh, come on. Don't be such a crab apple. I'll only be a minute," and Baba dragged a protesting Kip Burland backstage.

They both walked into the ballet dancer's dressing room, and right into a crowd, most of whom were gathered around a couch. One of the group detached himself, and walked up to the newcomers. "What are you doing here?" he growled.

"I'm Barbara Sutton, reporter for the Northville Inquirer, and I'd like a statement from Mr. Chekhov . . ." she began brightly.

"If you can get Chekhov to talk, you can have a thousand statements! He's dead!"

"Dead," Barbara gasped. "But the announcer out front told us that he was suffering with a sore foot."

"That was yesterday. Today, he's not suffering anymore. He died from tetanus infection. At least that's what the doctor here, tells me."

"Aren't you Mr. Livingston, Chekhov's manager?" Kip broke in.

"I was his manager. But unless you know how to get ten percent from a corpse, I'm looking for a new ballet dancer."

"How did it happen?" Barbara asked.

"He cut his foot on a nail in his shoe. Except for pouring on some iodine, he neglected it, and poof . . . tetanus poisoning."

Kip started casually strolling about the room. Finally, he walked into the bathroom, and a short while later emerged with a small vial in his hand, which he carefully concealed from view. He strolled up to Livingston, and said, "Did Chekhov pour the iodine on the cut himself?"

"Hummm . . . no, his personal Russian valet, that guy standing over there in the corner with his arms folded, put it on. But I don't see what you're getting at. After all, you'd expect Kalik to . . ."

But Kip didn't wait to hear what Livingston had to say about Kalik, for he started to walk back to the corpse again as though in idle curiosity. On the way, he brushed past Kalik.

"Ow," the valet yowled.

"Oh, pardon me," Kip spluttered, profusely apologetic. "I jabbed you with the point of my fountain pen, didn't I? Clumsy of me. Here let me dab it with some of this iodine I got out of the medicine chest."

"N . . . never mind," Kulik mumbled. "It'll be all right."

"Oh, but I insist. After all, it was my fault; here let me have your hand," with which Kip yanked Kulik's hand toward him.

"Let go, damn you," Kulik snarled. "I don't want any I tell you."

"Because you don't want to die the same way your master did, maybe," Kip said quietly.

A pall of silence fell over the whole room!

"Kip. What are you getting at?" Barbara finally broke the silence.

"That Kulik murdered his master," Kip answered, gazing fixedly at the valet. "He injected those tetanus germs into Chekhov with this bottle of iodine. Didn't you, Kulik?"

Kulik's answer was a hoarse curse. Savagely he rushed at Kip. It was a moment's work for Kip to sidestep, duck, and lash out with two bonecrushing blows! Kulik's eyes glazed. And he went down and out. The whole thing happened so quickly, that all just stood there open-mouthed.

At last one of the doctors recovered himself sufficiently to splutter. "Your accusation is ridiculous! Any medical man could tell you that Tetanus germs couldn't possibly live in iodine."

"Not iodine, perhaps. But they could in Argyrol. Here, look for yourself, doctor."

The doctor took the vial from Kip's hand, and sniffed at its contents. "By Jove," he exclaimed in utter amazement. "It is argyrol. But how on earth did you know?"

"I suspected it as soon as I noticed that there wasn't a trace of iodine on Chekhov's foot, although Gluckstein assured me that Kulik had applied a liberal yesterday. Iodine, as you yourself know, doctor, leaves some discoloration, so, obviously whatever was substituted had to resemble iodine. The only thing I could think of was argyrol."

Bobo looked at Kip with open-eyed admiration. "Kip, you're uncanny. But why did he do it?"

"That I'll let him tell for himself. He's conscious now. How about it, Kulik? Why did you, a faithful and loyal servant, kill Chekhov?"

"Faithful and loyal . . . pahl!" Kulik spat. "I wasn't his servant, I was his SLAVE! I, Kulik, should have led the glory and renown in the ballet world that he had. And the scum knew it. I could dance rings around him. But he also knew that I was born in America illegally . . . without a passport. So he blackmailed me, held this knowledge over my head as a club. Forced me to wait on him hand and foot. Life became unbearable. There was no other way."

After Kulik had been given his one way ride to police headquarters Kip rejoined Barbara. "What was that you were saying about forgetting your job on your night off?" she said archly.

"Uh . . . let's go to the movies, Barbara!"
